Erin Montgomery has always felt not quite at home.

When she watches an Australian Prime Minister apologise for the wrongs of a century, a half-remembered family story — land lost, or perhaps taken — sends the Oxford literature student to Tasmania, into the archives of a colony and the long shadow of her own ancestry. A novel about inheritance, injury and repair, and the question of where a person truly belongs.

“C. S. Lewis spoke about ‘smuggling theology’ into books that would be read by ordinary people. Graham Leo has achieved this in Tasmanian Dreaming.”

Louis Markos, Ph.D., Professor in English, Houston Christian University
